Tailoring Software For Multiple Processor Systems:

Tailoring Software for Multiple Processor Systems Karsten Schwan,1985 Tailoring Software for Multiple Processor Systems Karsten Schwans,1982 The contributions of this thesis are twofold First we design and implement a programming environment for multiple processor applications called the TASK system Second we discuss the integration of policies and mechanisms for resource management into the TASK system In TASK application programs are written in terms of the abstractions offered by the operating system used for program execution As a result once an application program is written its execution requires few additional efforts by the application s programmer Programs are written in two languages The TASK language designed and implemented as part of this thesis is used to describe the logical structure of an application program and an existing algorithmic language is employed to implement the application s algorithms The construction of an executable version of an application from the TASK and algorithmic language programs is automated Such construction includes automatic linking and loading as well as the automatic allocation of resources to the individual components of the application program Programmers guide the allocation of hardware resources to program components by stating high level directives in TASK programs To identify suitable directives and to develop procedures that automatically perform resource allocation based on these directives we develop a model of multiple processor software and hardware called the proximity model The model the directives and the resource allocation procedures are tested by experimentation with application programs on the Cm multiprocessor Hypercube Multiprocessors, 1987 Michael T.
