Between Swedish and Immigrant Adolescents David Mellor (M. Clin. Psychology.), Lucy Firth, 1983 Swedish society has changed rapidly in recent years because of a large and rather sudden influx of immigrants The ethnic and racial attitudes of the present adolescent population are of great interest therefore because they will establish the future of racial relations in Sweden Two separate studies analyzed the congruence discongruence of interracial perceptions among Swedes and immigrants The first study investigated the attitudes of sample groups of Swedish Finnish and Assyrian adolescents in Sodertalje an industrial town with a large number of immigrants In summary the findings show that Swedish and Finnish males have the most negative attitudes of any group and these are directed toward the Assyrians The Assyrians say they have neutral to positive attitudes toward both Swedes and Finns and Swedish and Finnish females report similar attitudes toward Assyrians The second study compared responses of the Sodertalje Swedish sample with those of an adolescent sample from Falun a community having minimal contact with immigrants The Falun and Sodertalje Swedes it was found have similarly negative attitudes toward Assyrians but the Sodertalje adolescents have more positive attitudes toward the Finns Further it seems that sex plays a greater role than contact in such issues and males in general are more extreme than females in their attitudes and understanding Whether these findings call for a radical revision of Sodertalje schools is unclear but cooperative learning techniques would possibly be of use in reducing prejudice The preface and chapter 5 of the document containing summary and conclusions are presented in both English and Swedish KH Suriname Rosemarijn Hoefte,1990
