Notes

Chapter 2: The Traditional Model

(1.) The main features of the socialist traditional model, according to economists Włodzimierz Brus, Gregory Grossman, and János Kornai, were broadly as follows:

1. State ownership of the means of production
2. Political dictatorship (mainly dictatorship of the proletariat)
3. A mono-hierarchical system (state ownership of means of production with political dictatorship)
4. Imperative planning
5. A subordinate role for money, profit, prices, and banks

(2.) The proletariat as a whole cannot exercise dictatorship, thus a unifying representative body must be established. This dictatorship has numerous economic consequences:

1. Feedback: Feedback was often suppressed and censored in order to hide often disastrous consequences from many policies, one being from the collectivisation of agriculture in the USSR.
2. Waste: There exists two types of waste, that being waste from counterproductive central policies and waste from unintended responses to central policies. Examples for the former include the economic crisis of 1931-3 in the USSR, economic crisis of 1958-62 in China, economic crisis of 1979-80 in Poland, and the decline in labour productivity in Cuba in the 60's and poverty and unemployment in Vietnam in the 70's and 80's. For the latter, examples mainly include from the reaction of "non-labour income campaigns" of 1986; food and housing situations worsened and many soviet cities, which continued to get worse when local officials prevented the delivery of food products that were grown on private land, as well as disallowing individuals to spare additional rooms in flats.
3. Party Mindedness: Since all problems must be carried out from the point of view of the party, one particular issue came about:
