

MUST SOCIOLOGICAL THEORY AND SOCIOLOGICAL PRACTICE BE SO FAR APART?: A Polemical Answer

JONATHAN H. TURNER*
University of California, Riverside

ABSTRACT: It is argued that sociological theory and its applications to real world problems should constitute the core of the discipline. Yet, the notion of "sociological practice" is abandoned in favor of a more rigorous application of sociological theory and research to engineering applications. Sociology should redefine and reorient its practice to create an engineering discipline where abstract theoretical principles are boiled down to rules of thumb and used to build or tear down social structures. By adopting an engineering orientation, sociological theory and research will be more focused and useful.

Most sociologists entered the discipline because they were interested in people and concerned about humanity. Virtually all of us, to varying degrees, wanted "to help people" and "make the world better." Very few of us aspired to be quantitative methodologists, or even researchers who would develop and use new methodologies and the latest statistical techniques, nor did we enter sociology to become theorists who would articulate abstract models and theories about the operation of the universe. Ask the average sociology major about their aspirations, and they will only rarely say that they want to do what we force them to do if they continue in the discipline—namely, learn quantitative methodology, study the classic theorists and, depending upon the program, learn various genres of contemporary "theory." There is, of course, nothing wrong with this emphasis, per se, since any discipline should be driven and shaped by its theories and methodologies. But something more happens in graduate school: the impulse that made us interested in sociology in the first place—the desire to contribute something useful to the problems of the world—gets lost, often being beaten out of us by courses in methods and theory. Moreover, if we retain an interest in social problems, we must often become ideologues—whether Marxists, feminists, post-modernists, or some other radical viewpoint—in order to set ourselves apart and

A Sociological Study of Muslim Labours in Bhopal Hilal Bhat, 2018-01-12 Research Paper postgraduate from the year 2012 in the subject Sociology Work Education Organisation Barkatullah University Bhopal language English abstract A Person is not only a social animal he/she is also an economic being. He/she is incessantly engaged in what are known as economic pursuits or activities. These economic activities are so multifaceted varied and complex that they constitute what is known as an economy. The main focus of the present study is to know the social and economic position of Muslim labours of Bhopal city. The Bhopal city is a Muslim dominated area where the Muslims living in the average standard are mostly engaged in labour works like motor mechanic working in motor garages running tea shops and also labouring in other small scale manufacturer units. The study is conducted in 2012 using both primary and secondary data. Madhya Pradesh is largely agricultural with nearly 90% of the rural population employed in primary sector activities such as agriculture mining and related fields. A majority of the farmers are small cultivators whose income over the years has been declining. Almost one third of the state's population lives below poverty line. The urban poverty is much higher when compared with that in rural areas. The survey data from Bhopal district suggest a much higher proportion of the population that could be declared as living in impoverished conditions as 96% of the urban dwellers of Madhya Pradesh live on less than Rs 38 50 per day. In Bhopal 75% households have annual income below Rs 25 000 and another 10 % having yearly income in the range of Rs 25000 50 000. 85 % percent of the population manages its living with annual earnings below Rs 50 000.
