simple poems written by an unostentatiously skilled poet Little Savage is permeated with a reverence for nature music myth and dance a veritable treasure trove of compassion and grace Richard Howard's Foreword You are alone in the room reading her poems Nothing is happening nothing wrong but all at once say around page 17 or 18 you hear remember no one is with you no one else is there a sigh Or a whispered word someone You are not alarmed but you had thought you were alone Perhaps not The sensation is what Freud used to call unheimlich uncanny That is the effect of the poems of Emily Fragos Like their maker her readers are accompanied and not to their ulterior knowledge It is not disagreeable to be thus escorted attended joined but we had not expected it And as Robert Frost used to tell us no surprise in the writer no surprise in the reader Fragos too has not expected such visitations as she will call them This poet these poems endure otherness they are haunted I remain with one of everything Even as one is being saved conjure the army of others What would happen to my life when all along there has been nothing but me Did you not see how I was made to feel when you put me among others And my body uninhabited suffers and wonders whose hands are these whose hair The poems will reveal whose though I do not think Emily Fragos herself ever finds out Inevitably we recall that old surrealist shibboleth Tell me by what you are haunted and I will tell you who you are it can be the password to indentify But this poet has what she calls luxurious mind and her ghosts are legion Alone in my odd shaped room I practice Blindness and the world floats close and away I am uncertain of everything I must walk slowly carefully She is acknowledging with some uneasiness will you please tidy up that it is not only the beloved dead the proximate departed who are with her who possess her but others any others The remarkable thing about this poetic consciousness is that the woman's body is inhabited sometimes with mere habitude sometimes joyously more often with astonishing pain by the prolixity of the real and of the unreal the poems are instinct with others How dare you Care for me when all my life I have had this voltage to ignite me this rhythm to drive me when something inside your body dares me to touch my hands to yours And quite as remarkable of course is the even tonality of such possession there is nothing hysterical or even driven about the voice of the poems as it records as it laments or exults in these unsought attendants There is merely merely a loving consistency of heedfulness and one remembers Blake's beautiful aphorism unmixed attention is prayer Of course such poetic staffage is not peculiar to Emily Fragos like Maeterlinck like Rilke she exults in her discovered awareness I need the other the way a virus needs a host Rather she imbues she infects all of us with the consciousness that there are no single souls we are not alone The Virginians William Makepeace Thackeray, 1896
