Farm Policies and Added Sugars in US Diets John Christopher Beghin, Helen H. Jensen, 2008 Major changes in the use of US sweeteners have occurred since 1970 in both the amount and composition Increased consumption of caloric sweeteners especially in beverages has been linked to excess energy intake and lower quality diets We examine how US farm policies specifically agricultural research and development R high fructose corn syrup HFCS became an inexpensive substitute for sugar in food beginning in 1970 However the effect of this change in the price of ingredients has become less important over time Today the farm value share in sweetened food is very small below 5% and HFCS has become a specialized input in many food items Countries with different or no commodity programs experience similar increases in consumption of added sugar We conclude that the current link between the US consumption of caloric sweeteners and farm policy is tenuous although historically the link was stronger
