

Does Philosophy Need to Know Its History?

Abstract

In this essay, I address the question whether philosophy needs to know its history, by comparing and contrasting philosophy with other areas of enquiry. In particular, I emphasize a feature of philosophy that distinguishes it from every other area of enquiry, namely that its history can be a significant contribution to it. That already points towards a positive answer to the question, although the answer takes some teasing out and towards the end of the essay I distinguish between what follows from this answer concerning philosophy as a discipline and what follows from it concerning the practice of individual philosophers. In between, I explore two factors that give philosophy this distinctive relation to its history: what I call Self-Consciousness and what I call Appropriation. By Self-Consciousness, I mean the fact that the nature of philosophy is itself a philosophical issue; by Appropriation, I mean the fact that, with respect to any great philosophical idea of the past that is no longer viable, there always remains a question about what we can do with it.

The question that Johnny Lyons has asked us to address is whether philosophy needs to know its history. Before I address it, I want to enter two caveats. The first caveat relates to the fact that each expression in the question has a significance that provides a suitable potential focus for the question as a whole. Thus, there is the issue of whether philosophy needs to know its history in a sense in which individual philosophers perhaps don't. There is the issue of whether philosophy needs to know its history, as opposed, say, to its merely benefiting from doing so. There is the issue of whether philosophy needs to know its history, as opposed, say, to its needing somehow to absorb that history in a less self-conscious way. There is the issue of whether philosophy needs to know its history, as opposed, say, to its needing to know some history of a broader kind. The first caveat is that, although I hope that what I have to say will have a bearing on each of these issues, often it will do so only implicitly: I won't always separate them out in what follows. (But there will be one notable exception, towards the very end.)

The second caveat relates to the fact that addressing any of these issues is liable to involve generalizing, which in turn poses a familiar problem. It is extremely difficult to generalize about issues of this kind without succumbing either to vacuity or to falsity. One finds oneself wanting to say that the relation between philosophy and its history is thus and so, or (in contrast to that) that the relation between some other enterprise and its history is not thus and so, or that an undertaking of this or that kind never amounts to such and such; and immediately all sorts of apparent counterexamples spring to mind, none of which can be dismissed except by means of a suitably question-begging interpretation of what it is to be thus and so or such and such. I think we just have to be Aristotelian about this and accept that the only non-trivial claims that we can make about such matters are claims about how things are 'for the most part'. The second caveat is that, at multiple points in what follows, this qualification is to be taken as read.

Having entered those two caveats, I also want to set aside a sense in which philosophy patiently needs to know its history but which is nevertheless of little interest in this context, in as much as it holds only because it is a sense in which any area of relatively organized communal intellectual enquiry, and certainly any academic discipline, needs to know its history: it tells us nothing distinctive about philosophy. I have in mind the fact that, given any such area of enquiry, each relevant question that has already definitively been answered, each relevant advance that has already clearly been made,
