

THE IMPERATIVE OF THE END OF THE MILITARY-INDUSTRIAL COMPLEX AND THE WAR ECONOMY IN THE WORLD

Fernando Alcoforado*

This article aims to present when and how the military-industrial complex and the war economy were born and structured in the great capitalist powers and demonstrate the imperative need for both to be brought to an end in the world so that world peace can exist. Currently, the progress of a nation or a region is measured by the size and growth of the GDP (Gross Domestic Product). In calculating GDP, measures are made of production in industry, agriculture, the service sector, of the household consumption, government spending, business investment and the trade balance. The formula for calculating GDP is as follows:

$$\text{GDP} = \text{private consumption (C)} + \text{total investments made (I)} + \text{government spending (G)} + \text{exports (X)} - \text{imports (M)}$$

An economy goes into recession when there is a drop in private consumption (C) and in total investments made (I). It was Keynes who suggested that, in times of recession and depression, government spending (G) should increase to compensate for the drop in consumption and investment in the economy to maintain full employment. The war economy [1] emerged in Nazi Germany and the United States in the 1930s of the twentieth century as a set of economic practices applied with the aim of stabilizing a country's economy during a period of war with the expansion of public spending. This happens when the functioning of the capitalist system collapses, as happened in Germany and the United States in the 1930s. From the 20th century onwards, in a depressed environment, unable to invest their profits in the reproduction of capital goods or consumer goods, the capitalist system, represented by its dominant class, sought to invest in a new area, the production of armaments, because war contributes to increasing the sale of arms, promoting the increase of industry, commerce and services and mobilize civil construction with the post-war reconstruction effort, such as the Marshall Plan after the 2nd World War, in addition to eliminating population surpluses with the mass murder of soldiers and civilian populations as occurred in the 1st and 2nd World War (80 million dead).

A war economy [1] operates as a system of production, mobilizing and allocating resources to sustain violence. Many nation states, particularly great powers, increase the degree of planning in their economies during wars. On the aggregate demand side, the war economy concept has been linked to the concept of "military Keynesianism", in which the government's military budget stabilizes business cycles and fluctuations and/or is used to fight recessions and depressions as Hitler did in Nazi Germany after the 1st World War when the German economy recovered from the depression that occurred in the 1920s and Franklin Delano Roosevelt in the United States occurred in the 1930s when the North American economy recovered from the depression resulting from the crisis of the New York Stock Exchange in 1929. On the supply side, wars are seen to accelerate technological progress to such an extent that an economy is strongly strengthened after war, especially if it has not suffered war-related destruction. This was the case for the United States which did not suffer internal destruction as a result of World War II and it was not the case for Germany where much of the country was destroyed during World War II.

During World War II, the Nazis introduced new policies that not only caused Germany's unemployment rate to drop, but also created a capable war machine. The Third Reich
