The Tarzan Twins Edgar Rice Burroughs, 2020-05-04

A train wound slowly through mountains whose rugged slopes were green with verdure and out across a rolling grassy veldt tree dotted. From a carriage window two boys, eager-eyed, excited, kept constant vigil. If there was anything to be seen, they were determined not to miss it, and they knew that there should be many things to see. 'I'd like to know where all the animals are said Dick wearily. I haven't seen a blamed thing since we started Africa,' said just like all the one horse circuses replied Doc. They advertise the greatest collection of wild animals in captivity, and when you get there, all they have is a mangy lion and a couple of motheaten elephants. 'Golly, wouldn't you like to see a real lion or an elephant or something?' sighed Dick. 'Look, look,' exclaimed Doc suddenly. 'There, there, see 'em.' In the distance a small herd of springbok ran swiftly and gracefully across the veldt, the dainty little animals occasionally leaping high into the air. As the animals disappeared, the boys again relapsed into attitudes of watchful waiting. 'I wish they'd been lions,' said Dick.
