

Sport in Society, Sociology and Journals: Missing Perspectives and Cultural Idiosyncrasies in an International Social Institution

Abstract

The multi-levelled discourse of this topic brings out the fact that sport appears in different patterns from different levels. Sociology presents an impression that only select perspectives of sport as a cultural and social-scientific social institution. This is highlighted by recent developments in the literature. The author focuses culture of the transatlantic Western but the knowledge of sport, culture, that sport is primarily in being beyond words which seems an inevitability about the topic and the cultural background of the authors, and sometimes even explicitly and even implicitly about sport. Sport actually concerns the culture of body and mind, contradicted by today's mainstream sociology.

The Topic and What It Means for Us

The organization of this paper takes out of the topic: (1) Sport is primarily concerned with the body, (2) Society is everything in which we live. Many disciplines seek to comment on this from their respective perspectives. (3) Sociology is and has a particular perspective. The perspectives of other human and social sciences are different: Biology, economics, medicine, pedagogy, philosophy, political sciences, psychology, social psychology, ethnology — they all have a different image of man and, in our case, of the athlete and how to train and analyze him and his behavior. Presumably these perspectives are not emphasized or considered from our sociological view. But it is among the tasks of sociology to analyze the perspectives and descriptions of its own and other disciplines, and to show this from its own viewpoint. All the journals in hand have printed, issued paper on football from which I selected to depend on the editor, editorial policy, the reputation of the journal, and the authors, their styles and their cultural backgrounds.

Sport means many different things to many different people. Sport can be pursued by normal people, somewhat differently, sociologists engage in, view, describe and analyze sport culture and from different activities, the results of which can become increasingly discussed without seeing through the sociological level. Sociologists emphasize only one particular perspective. From this perspective they are more than other people, but also overlook much that is obvious to others. This limitation therefore simultaneously brings gain and loss, advance in knowledge and closing of the mind.
