

The Call to Fight for Freedom

A determined and far-reaching recruitment effort provided soldiers for the black regiments.

In Massachusetts, recruitment of troops occurred mainly on a local level, with each city or town given a series of quotas to fulfill. Governor John Andrew, an early proponent of black military service, finally gained permission to establish a Massachusetts black regiment in 1863. New recruiting methods were needed, as Massachusetts itself did not have a large enough black population to fill one. African-Americans from other states also sought ways to enlist in order to seek freedom for their black brothers in bondage. Recruiting agents for the Massachusetts black regiments were established in a number of states, with most joining from New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Ohio. Prominent members of the African-American community, including Frederick Douglass and Lewis Hayden, were involved in promoting recruiting efforts. These efforts provided not only enough men to form the 54th infantry, but a second regiment, the 55th, as well.

Barracks at Readville
Camp Meigs at Readville (then part of Dedham, now Hyde Park) was the major Massachusetts revolutionary camp where recruits were sent and regiments formed and trained, including the 54th. In May (on left left May 28, 1862), the 55th Infantry (left July 7, 1864) and the 5th Cavalry (left May 28, 1864).

54th Infantry Regiment recruitment poster
State aid was a Massachusetts program that supported families while the breadwinner was at war. While this was an attractive inducement to enlistment, the many black soldiers in the regiment from outside Massachusetts found that they were not eligible for this benefit.

Enlistment roll, 1862-1864
This roll of Recruit Company records includes descriptions of African-Americans assigned to the 54th Infantry and the 5th Cavalry. The inscription "Recruit" describes one who came for service - an ideal background for a soldier in a cavalry unit.
