What is a probability distribution? A probability distribution is a statistical model that describes the likelihood of different outcomes in a random process. It is a function that maps the possible outcomes of a random process to their probabilities. The most common type of probability distribution is the normal distribution, which is a bell-shaped curve that is symmetric around the mean. Other types of probability distributions include the binomial distribution, the Poisson distribution, and the exponential distribution. The choice of which probability distribution to use depends on the nature of the random process being modeled.
