Stanley, 2019-10-10 It is now something more than a century since the general division of psychic phenomena into intellect feeling and will first came into repute but still some psychologists of note do not agree to this fundamental classification but would unite feeling and will in a single order As to the subdivisions of feeling and will we are confessedly wholly at sea In intellect it is only on the lower side sensation and perception that anything of great scientific value has been accomplished and even now it cannot be said that the classes of sensation have been marked off with perfect certainty In the higher range of intellect psychology can do scarcely more than accept some ready made divisions from common observation and logic And if so little has been settled in the comparatively simple work of a descriptive classification of the facts of mind we may be assured that still less has been accomplished toward a scientific consensus for the laws of mind Weber's law alone seems to stand on any secure basis of experiment but its range and meaning are still far from being determined Even the laws of the association of ideas are still the subjects of endless controversy Also in method there is manifestly the greatest disagreement The physiological and introspective schools each magnify their own methods sometimes so far as to discredit all others Physiological method has won for itself a certain standing indeed but just what are its limitations is still far from being settled The Moral and Political Philosophy of Plato's Laws Christopher Joseph
