Regulating Online Campaign Finance Chasing the Ghost? Khushbu Agrawal, Yukihiko Hamada and Alberto Fernández Gibaja,2021-04-16 As the number of Internet and social media users increases political parties and candidates are spending significant amounts of money on online campaigning It not only helps them to reach out to more voters with comparatively lower costs but also allows them to communicate more targeted messages to voters when compared with other traditional campaign tools Despite the growing use of online campaigns appropriate regulation of online expenditures is almost non existent around the world In fact online expenditure is one of the key weaknesses of political finance systems and regulatory frameworks Appropriate regulation of online expenditures will not only protect the integrity of the political process but also thwart negative effects such as disinformation and polarization and more generally prevent inauthentic activities that usually characterize online campaigns As online expenditure is a relatively new phenomenon its regulation is not straightforward and there is no conclusive evidence on what works This report outlines some of the challenges that policymakers legislators and oversight agencies face when drafting and implementing laws to include online expenditure within the scope of regulated political finance It also provides recommendations for policymakers social media platforms political parties candidates and campaigners as well as civil society actors on the steps that they can take towards closing the regulatory gap
