Some limited improvements occurred. It was the combined influences of more strict rules, more severe discipline by officers, and more money, that were the main influences. However, these factors are not the only ones that can be used to explain the significant amount of progress that was made. The factors of strict rules, money, and more money, all contributed to the improved American management of the economy during the 1920s. The progress of the economy again was mainly determined by the actions of the government, and the money, the money supply, helped the cause. The government gave the people money, allowing business and the economy to continue to grow. The economy's main obstacle to growth was that the rich, middle-class, were too conservative and unwilling to change. The Peasant class was another for the same. However, they were the ones that had the most money, and the most influence on the economy. Therefore, the Peasant class was the main driving force behind the economy's improvement. The Peasant class is the one that was the most influential, and the one that had the most power. The Peasant class was the main driving force behind the economy's improvement. The Peasant class is the one that was the most influential, and the one that had the most power.
