The Multi-layered Nature of the Silver Age

Barbara C. Edwards

Recent years bring new perspectives to the earliest books in the Silver Age, and a new appreciation of the subsequent decades. This article attempts to delineate the major developments in the field of American literature during the period 1845-1865, and to place them in the context of the major literary movements of the time.

Recent editorship, criticism, and scholarship have focused on the major movements of the period, and the major figures they produced. But there is another side to the story. The period 1845-1865 was a time of great literary ferment, through the many and varied publications.

The first period of the movement, during the 1840s, was a time of great literary ferment, but also of great literary stagnation. The major figures of the period were the major figures of the time, and the major movements of the period were the major movements of the time. The major figures of the period were the major figures of the time, and the major movements of the period were the major movements of the time.

There were two periods of literary ferment in the period 1845-1865, but the first period was the more important, and the second period was the more important.
