that needs to be transmitted In the most general case studied in this thesis each user can have any arbitrary convex cost function We provide a polynomial time deterministic algorithm in the number of users and packets that finds an optimal communication scheme that minimizes the communication cost To further lower the complexity we also propose a simple randomized algorithm inspired by our deterministic algorithm which is based on a random linear network coding scheme In the later chapters we consider a general form of side information where each user observes independent realizations of some joint random process For such scenario we provide a polynomial time algorithm in the number of users and packets that finds an optimal communication rate allocations for all the users Next we study two extensions to the original data exchange problem First we consider the problem where not all users in the system are interested in obtaining the file but they are willing to help users who are Also we explore the problem where each user can communicate only to its immediate neighbors through a wireline network For both the problems we provide a polynomial time algorithm that is inspired by the original data exchange problem Parallel Computation Models Xian-He Sun,1990 Wall Street & Technology ,1996
