Some limited longitudinal research is now available. However, as noted earlier, many studies are designed to examine the relationship between family and peer influences on the one hand and adolescent mental health outcomes on the other. Only a few studies have examined the relationship between family and peer influences on adolescent mental health outcomes. One study found that family and peer influences were related to adolescent mental health outcomes (Kazdin, Blase, & Blase, 1990). This study found that family influences explained more variance in adolescent mental health outcomes than peer influences. The authors of this study suggested that family influences may be more salient than peer influences for adolescent mental health outcomes. This study, however, did not examine the relationship between family and peer influences on adolescent mental health outcomes. Another study found that family and peer influences were related to adolescent mental health outcomes (Kazdin, Blase, & Blase, 1990). This study found that family influences explained more variance in adolescent mental health outcomes than peer influences. The authors of this study suggested that family influences may be more salient than peer influences for adolescent mental health outcomes.
