Verges, 2025-01-21 An antiracist theory of cleaning. In Making the World Clean Wasted Lives Wasted Environment and Racial Capitalism. Francoise Verges examines the racial and gendered politics of wasting lands bodies and resources and the organized deprivation of clean water shelter and access to health services in other words the structural denial along racial lines of vital needs. Through 38 short sections she looks at the social relations that have made cleaning into drudgery and into a racialized gendered poorly paid job that is nevertheless necessary for any society to function. She concludes with the proposition of a feminist decolonial antiracist anti patriarchal and anti capitalist politics of cleaning. Or simply put of decolonial cleaning. To Verges the structural denial of the elemental needs of women of color sanitary pads access to water and privacy for basic washing and why these needs are considered insignificant and trivial shows how racism and class war are gendered. By examining the banal the trivial and the elemental the author addresses cleaning as a necessity rather than the maintenance of a consumerist lifestyle a condition of basic care of the body and the mind that is considered with indifference by racial capitalism white environmentalism and even too often by humanitarian organizations. She argues that by building life affirming institutions as Ruth Wilson Gilmore advocates struggles against the whitening of cleaning create sites of freedom. Decolonial cleaning imagines cleaning as taking care of land humans plants animals and rivers not seeking to discipline them or transform them into commodities or objects of conservation but cleaning as a practice dedicated to sustaining the living world
