intimacies have mattered to imperialist and nationalist understandings and practices of citizenship. The book moves across historical periods and national contexts ranging from nineteenth century indentureship in Jamaica to early twentieth century American military intervention in the Dominican Republic, Haiti and Trinidad. Through an interdisciplinary and comparative study of novels by contemporary diasporic Caribbean women writers, Donette Francis demonstrates that the sexual realities of women and girls challenge conventional regional histories. Francis defines this emergent feminist literature as antiromance and argues that these novels contest the heteronormative model of coupling that underwrites constructions of home, family, nation and diaspora in the Caribbean. Writing against the critical impulse to underscore women's agency, Francis considers instead how Caribbean female subjects dwell in liminal spaces of both vulnerability and possibility.
