I published my first article in Sexuality & Culture almost fifteen years ago (Wright, 2009) and have been on the Editorial Board for about a decade. While many journals in the sexuality space promote interdisciplinary awareness and dialogue, I've always admired Sexuality & Culture for making this an explicit goal of its editorial mission. Scholars of impressively varied methodological and theoretical backgrounds submit to Sexuality & Culture and the Editorial Board is notable for its disciplinary diversity. We might be missing a potential audience and author base of interest, however – economists. There are psychologists, sociologists, journalists, anthropologists, criminologists, communication scientists, and lawyers (among others) on the Editorial Board. But there are no economists. And a search of the journal's nearly 1000+ articles for the term "econometric" yields a single result (Majumdar, 2018). The purpose of this commentary is to increase the Sexuality & Culture community's awareness of the potential relevance of economists' research to our scholarship and (hopefully) raise awareness among economists that the sexuality topics we study can inform their theorizing and project selection. I will use a recently published article by an influential econometrician as the springboard for furthering these ends.

Professor Edward Castronova is a highly influential media economist, perhaps most famous for his work on virtual economies (Potter, 2021). Castronova recently published a theoretical econometric essay on preference evolution, the attention economy, and happiness in the economics journal Kyklos (Castronova, 2023). Castronova combined theoretical reasoning, key empirical studies, and mathematical formulae to build an argument that the attention economy engendered by mass and social media creates a scenario of cascading misperceptions wherein media consumers (1) incorrectly believe that media models are happier than they are; (2) misattribute media models' differentially higher happiness to behavioral propensities that
