seawards to find a practicable passage On our way we tried to push between the icebergs but were soon stopped The floes get jammed so fast in between these monsters by the furious current that there is no possibility of moving them So we had to return once more and go further out to sea If in ordinary ice it is necessary to get a look ahead from some high lying point it is no less necessary to take the same measures among icebergs such as these So whenever we came across one that was easily accessible we naturally mounted it at once Imposing as these floating monsters look from below when one rows beneath them the effect as far as regards their magnitude is nothing to that produced when one sees them from above One we ascended at The First Crossing of Greenland, Volume 1... - Scholar's Choice Edition Fridtjof and beasts of the field that ate meat raw But at the time they said nothing but maintained an attitude of dumb despair at the fate which had thrown them into the society of savages who had as they often used to say such strange ways quite different from those of the Lapps They could scarcely endure to see us eating I could of course easily have cooked some of the meat for them but we had to be sparing of the spirit We were likely to want it all later on and it was only two or three times during our wanderings in the floe ice that we allowed ourselves the luxury of cooking anything As a rule all our food was cold and for drink we had either plain water of which we had an abundance in larger and smaller pools on the floes or else a mixture of water and preserved milk which made a pleasant and refreshing beverage This time the Lapps were treated to tinned beef instead of the horseflesh and they seemed quite consoled for the first disappointment the beef being pronounced by Balto to be good clean food How common it is to see things in this life turned completely upside down by prejudice In connexion with the above I will quote an answer Balto gave one day after we reached home to some one who asked what his worst experience had been in the course of his travels The worst thing said Balto was once when we were drifting in the ice and were just being carried out into the Atlantic I asked Nansen whether he thought we should get to land and he said     The First Crossing of Greenland, by Fridtjof Nansen, Translated from the Norwegian by Hubert Majendie Gepp,...
