BY JAMES J. ASKEW
LONDON: HARRIS & CO.

1890

Turning to the old books of the time we often see clubs to have the like. Mr. Askew has made a singular study of the growth of the club among the literary circles of England in the second half of the 18th century. He traces the rise of the club as a gathering of a select number, shows the various clubs that in the earlier days of the Town, grew out of the desire for the welfare of the King's Club, and contains many old associations, other various other societies. A considerable part of the book deals with the formation and growth of the various clubs, the names of which however are not always mentioned in the pages. The book also deals with the various literature, plays, and writers.
