Illustrated by Sydney R. Jones](#) Peter Hampson Ditchfield, The Countryside Ideal Michael Bunce, 2005-10-26 Draws together diverse images of landscape to explore the historical processes shaping our continuing attachment to the countryside seen in artistic expression attitudes to nature country life and the development of rural and urban land. The Charm of the English Village (Classic Reprint) P. H. Ditchfield, 2016-11-11 Excerpt from The Charm of the English Village. He introduced improvements devised by his own ingenuity and skill created picturesque effects which added beauty to the building. Sometimes his purse was full with the price of his rich eeces and he could afford to adorn his home with more elaborate decoration sometimes res angusta domi when times were bad compelled him to aim at greater simplicity with no less satisfactory results. Another cause of variety in the appearance of our village buildings is the different nature of the materials used in their construction. Geology plays no small part in the production of various styles of village architecture. In the days of our forefathers in Elizabethan or Jacobean times there were no railroads to transport slates from Wales or dump down wagon loads of bricks or beams of timber in a country that possessed good stone quarries. They were obliged to use the materials which nature in their own district afforded. This was the great secret of their success. Nature's productions harmonise best with the face of nature in the district where they are produced. Alien buildings have always an un satisfactory appearance and if we modern folk would build with good effect we must use the natural material provided by the quarries or woods or clay pits indigenous to the district and not transport our materials from afar.
