The Gray Whale: Eschrichtius Robustus Mary Lou Jones, Steven L. Swartz, Stephen Leatherwood, 2012-12-02 The Gray Whale Eschrichtius robustus provides an introduction to the understanding of Eschrichtius robustus or the gray whale. This book explores the life processes, reproduction, and growth of large cetacean populations. Organized into four parts encompassing 25 chapters, this book begins with an overview of the gray whale evolution, fossils, and subfossil remains, range and systematics in historical times. This text then presents the historical of gray whale exploitation and the economic importance of these whales to humans. Other chapters consider the gray whale migration, abundance, and seasonal distribution in the wake of the California population's recovery from depletion. This book discusses as well the methods used in shore based censuses during migration and in aerial surveys of gray whales taken on their winter grounds. The final chapter deals with some innovative approaches to the study of free ranging cetaceans. This book is a valuable resource for anthropologists, paleontologists, biologists, and naturalists.

Whale Monitoring Study, 1989 On Death of Susanna J. Gray, 1843 Western Gray Whale (Eschrichtius Robustus) Mother and Calf Ecology Off Sakhalin Island Olga Aleksandrovna Sychenko, 2012 The western population of gray whales Eschrichtius robustus is endangered with approximately 130 individuals remaining. Many individuals return annually to the same feeding sites off northeastern Sakhalin Island, indicating a site specific dependence to this geographic area. This apparently critically important habitat is especially vital for nursing females and their calves as female energetic requirements are increased during lactation and calves need to be ready to separate and begin to feed on their own. This study focuses on movements, respiration, and behavioral patterns of mother-calf pairs on their feeding ground, with data collected during summer-autumn of 2002-2009. Shore-based observations included three methods: theodolite tracking, focal animal behavior sampling, and photo identification. Whales were categorized as three groups of individuals: mother-calf pairs, weaned calves, and other individuals. Analyses were performed to assess differences between groups of individuals and in relation to their behavior. The null hypothesis of the study was that there were no differences in movement, respiration, and behavior between groups.

behavioral patterns and habitat use between different groups of individuals. Results did not support this hypothesis. Significant differences in movements and respirations were found for certain groups of individuals. These differences also varied in relation to the whales behavioral activity feeding, feeding, traveling and traveling. The shore based photography was used to obtain additional information on individuals especially mother calf pairs and their sightings as well as to evaluate the success of this approach. A total of 144 individuals including 10 females sighted with calves and 31 calves were identified during 2004-2009. The shore based photo identification approach was successful and due to being a non invasive technique is recommended as a supplemental approach to vessel based photo ID efforts. Reproductive success and survival of western gray whales are concern especially due to the presence of industrial activity in the area as well as recently increased mortalities of female gray whales off Japan. Therefore the results of this study indicate the importance of considering differences in needs and habitat utilization of different groups of individuals for basic science information as well as for management purposes of protection of western gray whales.
