

Family size, family composition, and family structure have complicated family relationships, introducing challenges in developing simple dynamics. Residential density and mobility are contributing traditional family roles, while people's living traits, previously affected by familial connections. However, residential patterns, especially among lower socio-economic groups, are increasingly disconnected by others. Likewise, social and economic transformations, particularly between urban and rural regions, amplify these changes. Overall, a more family culture has declined, where interest for community needs increased through media that connects with culture and potential emerging fields. Likewise, media highlights practical measures of change and continuity in family life, demonstrating the evolving social structures [21, 22].

Contemporary Family Types

Family structures in Malaysia continue their growth and changing dynamics, particularly in urban regions over the past six years. Stable family types like single-parent families, stepfamilies, and co-parents, despite being present. Alongside this, more fluid types are emerging in line with the fast-paced technological advancements. The rise of these alternative family structures also has affected roles in social interactions and relationships, such as the recognition of same-sex partnerships in law. Consequently, there are more diverse family structures. Single-parent families have become common since the 1990s due to societal changes. Single-parent families, same-sex partnerships, stepparents, and blended families are common, and people generally consider these more traditional marital arrangements, challenging established family models. Moreover, although the number of households living alone or smaller households has risen over the years, others linked to post-industrial job market shifts and urban lifestyle choices, may now have common partnerships outside of marriage. However, despite the emergence of modern family forms, the nuclear family remains prominent, especially in rural areas for traditional lifestyles. This prevalence is partially historical, as nuclear families have had time to acclimate to modern changes in family society, while alternative family forms, despite their growth following the 1990s, remain marginalized [23, 24].

Cultural Influences on Family Dynamics

In a globalized world with migration and cross-cultural interactions, recognizing the complexity of cultural factors shaping family dynamics is crucial. While modernization influences family structures, migration and cultural influences affect family roles. Cultural settings affect gender norms and behavior, leading to distinct family roles and relationships. Modern globalization influences both cultural and ethnic groups and are influenced by migration. Understanding these cultural influences and adapting research methods can enhance insights into family processes. Cultural factors shape culture, behavior, and ethnic families. Impacting culture's identity and intergenerational relationships. Factors such as responsibility, respect, and trust are critical to bonding, maintaining, and acknowledging relationships in family dynamics. Likewise, experienced in specific cultural contexts may find traditional nuclear家庭结构, premarriage restrictions, migration, and social culture similar across cultural contexts. Building resilience and supporting members, cultural family structures are connected due to similarities in cultural beliefs, which can reduce conflicts by study [25]. Acknowledging cultural competencies involves understanding and just cultural rules that allow these applications to succeed. These elements enrich the analysis of cultural diversity and family structures [26, 27].

Economic Factors Affecting Families

The "economic factor" significantly influences the state of family transformations across the EU and helps explain the different trends in each country. Economic factors are vital in affecting family stability, family composition, marital functions, relationships quality, and partnership. However, income varies as both an opportunity and a source of financial stress, while family roles play a critical role in stabilizing family life through communication, interaction, and structure, alongside economic and financial dependency. The economic context impacts family bonding by altering the division of labor, the composition of social networks, and the characteristics of potential partners. Economic factors are concerned in shaping family dynamics, yet there are many other risks. Some factors are job instability, high-fighting, low employment, and income affect partnership and parenting the family, impacting job stability, and financial dependency opportunities. These apparent family economic conditions in demographic processes like family size and earnings. Alternatively, the broader impact of economic conditions on family life is also noted, considering the shifts in family roles and expectations and no longer just changes and household factors are responsible for economic shifts. Economic factors and processes directly influence family arrangements and family life [28, 29].
