

structure is a construct of Western academic and Indian scholarly minds. Although the book is concerned with the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, it has great relevance to what is happening to caste in the twentieth century, both within the Christian community and wider Indian society. Second, Hudson brings real sophistication into the discussion of the relationship between European missionaries and Tamil-speaking peoples, which rightly highlights the agency of the local people. The early Tamil Christians were not passive recipients of the religiocultural ideas of the missionaries; rather, they constructed, on their own, a Christian faith and conduct indigenous to their landscape, culture, and language. This is one of the unique contributions of this book.

Hudson mentions in the preface that he opted to use terms such as Malabarians, heathens, pagans, and Moors in place of the contemporary terms Tamilians, Hindus, and Muslims. Though this makes reading less smooth than one would like it to be, Hudson succeeds in his purpose to help the reader empathetically enter into the spirit of eighteenth-century Tamil Christianity. At the same time, it gives the reader a healthy distance from contemporary Tamil society. The book also provides the reader with a very helpful glossary, a substantial and select bibliography, and a comprehensive index at the end. This book is required reading for any serious student of the religions of India, especially Christianity in India. Hudson's excellent treatment of a very small segment of Protestant Christians in Tamilnadu will hopefully inspire scholars to delve into other segments of the Christian population.

The Passing of Patrimonialism: Politics and Political Culture in Hyderabad, 1911–1948. By MARGRIT PERNAU. Delhi: Manohar, 2000. x, 395 pp. Rs. 700.

For all the revolutions and reassessments that have taken place recently in South Asian history, there remains but little work dedicated to exploring the two-fifths of the subcontinent that comprised the so-called princely states of India. Margrit Pernau's The Passing of Patrimonialism, a translation of her 1992 German Verfassung und politische Kultur im Wandel, represents in its focus upon political culture in Hyderabad a welcome addition to the literature.

The central intervention of the work is the challenge it presents to the predominant view of princely states as static fossils, as, in Pernau's words, "flies-in-amber" that rigidly held in place "traditional" political culture. To make this point, Pernau examines Hyderabad under the rule of Mir Osman Ali Khan, the last Nizam, contrasting this period with that of the previous, the rule of "the Beloved" Mahbub Ali Pasha, and that of the following, the time of the Telengana communist uprising, the rise of the "radical" Muslim party Ittehad ul Muslimin, and the military takeover by the Indian state. Tradition, she argues, is partially an invention of the present, that is, a reflection of the way the present interacts with the past. In this sense, tradition is very much linked with change, especially as it is employed to meet dynamic political circumstances. But the concept of tradition also connotes continuity, the maintenance of customs and rituals over a course of time. Tradition, then, was a source of political legitimacy, a constantly renegotiated but reinforcing bridge to symbols that perpetuated authority and defined a right to rule. In the post-Mughal realities of native states, and particularly in Hyderabad, this tradition was interwoven
