The Law and Policy of Toxic Substances Control David D. Doniger,1978 What Process is Due? David M. O'Brien,1988-03-30 Are judges competent to decide complex scientific disputes over toxic chemicals and hazardous wastes Have courts gone too far in awarding damages to victims Does the judiciary unreasonably constrain free market forces and usurp power from democratically elected branches of government What constitutes judicial due process in the regulation of health safety and environmental risks David O'Brien addresses these and other key questions in a comprehensive survey of the role of courts in resolving science policy disputes He theorizes that such disputes with their burden of scientific uncertainty and intense value conflict become judicialized in the United States because they pose an uncomfortable trilemma for policy makers how to accommodate competing demands for scientific certainty political compromise and procedural fairness in the regulation of risks When policy negotiations break down courts are called on not to settle scientific controversies per se but in their traditional role as independent tribunals for settling value conflicts and imposing norms in a pluralistic society This interpretation is enhanced by a unique set of case studies including DES and asbestos litigation and the ban on Tris a carcinogenic flame retardant O'Brien's analytical framework and his detailed examples illuminate the extent the implications and the underlying causes of the judicialization of risk regulation
