

CHAPTER 13

READING AND WRITING ABOUT PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SPACE

Whether we are in bedrooms, bathrooms, coffeehouses, classrooms, stadiums, or record stores, we are always someplace, and understanding our relationship to these places and spaces helps us better understand the world. How? By providing us tools to recognize the way the physical world influences our inner world, the way those constructing spaces might shape us, or attempt to.

In this chapter, we will talk about public and private space, architecture, and design as constructed texts as an entrée into writing about those spaces. What we mean by space is the environment created by human-made activities, including built areas, such as classrooms, stadiums, shopping malls, and dorm rooms. Architecture and design are forces that help construct these places and spaces and give them their particular personality.

In a sense, architects and designers are the authors of buildings and public spaces; they construct these texts through a series of decisions. And if you look around you, not only will you see patterns of decisions made by architects and designers, but you will also see the influence of those who pay the designers and the people who use or live in that particular space.

For example, architects may have had some leeway in designing your classroom, but their decisions about certain aspects of appearance or comfort might have been affected by construction cost, local building codes, and state educational requirements. The kind of institution you attend, whether it is a private or public university or college, probably had some impact on these decisions. The designers and architects were limited by function—putting a fireplace or a kitchen in a classroom would be inappropriate. And the designers were undoubtedly influenced by the period in which they lived; you probably can pinpoint the date within twenty years of construction based on colors, materials, and lighting. For instance, rectangular buildings built with brick or cinder blocks reflect the architectural style of the 1960s and 1970s, whereas a wooden Victorian house was probably built as much as 100 years earlier.

Such decisions also exist in corporate and retail venues. If you walk into a Starbucks, for example, you will see the results of a series of carefully made judgments: the color scheme, the décor and the lighting, the font type of the signs that describe coffee products, and where all of this is placed. It is not hard to gather from these aspects of design
