Among adolescents in the U.S., Mexican American youth have the highest rates of depression and suicidal ideation. Acculturation theory was used as the framework in developing a comprehensive counseling approach to address the mental health needs of Latino adolescents in the United States (U.S.). The Holistic Approach for Counseling Mexican American Adolescents incorporates acculturation issues and familial relationships, while working towards the improvement of Latino adolescents' well-being. The authors provide professional counselors with recommendations for increasing cultural competence to effectively work with the Latino population. For future research, exploration of relationships between adolescent well-being, familial relationships, and acculturation is suggested.

A Holistic Approach to Counseling Mexican American Adolescents

It has been reported that Latino adolescents experience more anxiety, depression, and daily stress often leading to disruptive behaviors and poor mental health than their non-Latino White peers. In particular, Mexican American youth were found to have the highest rates of depression and suicidal ideation among U.S. adolescents (Aldridge & Roesch, 2008; Garcia, Skay, Sieving, Naugthon, & Bearinger, 2008). The Latino population makes up about 16.3 percent of the total U.S. population and continues to increase as more families migrate to the U.S. from their countries (Pew Hispanic Center, 2011). Mexican Americans comprise the majority of Latinos (i.e., 67%), the largest ethnic minority group in the U.S., and one that has grown rapidly over the past two decades (Updegraff, Delgado, & Wheeler, 2009). Latino American adolescents aged 10 to 19 make up about 16 percent of the adolescent population in the (U.S.) (National Adolescent Health Information Center, 2003).

Current research has explored Mexican American adolescents' development and mental health in relation to their familial relationships, and acculturation issues independently (Chung, Chen, Greenberger, & Heckhausen, 2009; Garcia & Saewyc, 2007). These studies suggest that there is a positive correlation between familial relationships and adolescent development and well-being, and a negative correlation between acculturation and adolescent development and well-being. Despite the findings that show familial relationships and acculturation are significant factors in an adolescent's development and well-being, majority of research fails to
