Olson, Harold Morton Mooney, Harold M. Mooney, 1964 Seismic background noise was measured at a location on the Arctic coast of Alaska Continuous high speed records were obtained with calibrated amplitudes Frequency response extended from 1 to 100 cps 0.1 to 1 second periods The records were digitized in order to compute power spectra The most striking result was the existence of a spectral peak at approximately 12 cps 0.7 to 12 second period Maximum amplitudes of ground vibration correlated well with ocean surf activity as well as with barometric lows maximum wave heights and maximum wind velocities Amplitudes differed by a factor of 10 between conditions of quiet and active surf with peak to peak ground displacements of the order 0.01 and 0.1 microns respectively The shape of the power spectra and the position on the frequency scale of the spectral peak were largely independent of surf activity and the other factors noted above Author
