

A Small Deceit

by David Shields

It was a small, unassuming house, nestled in a quiet neighborhood.

The house was old, with a dark, weathered exterior and a small, arched doorway.

The house was surrounded by a lush garden, with flowers and shrubs in full bloom.

The house was the only one of its kind in the neighborhood, and it was the only one that had been there for as long as anyone could remember.

The house was the only one that had a secret, and it was the only one that had a story.

The house was the only one that had a past, and it was the only one that had a future.

The house was the only one that had a soul, and it was the only one that had a heart.

The house was the only one that had a life, and it was the only one that had a death.

The house was the only one that had a love, and it was the only one that had a hate.

The house was the only one that had a dream, and it was the only one that had a nightmare.

The house was the only one that had a hope, and it was the only one that had a despair.

The house was the only one that had a faith, and it was the only one that had a doubt.

The house was the only one that had a belief, and it was the only one that had a disbelief.

The house was the only one that had a truth, and it was the only one that had a lie.

The house was the only one that had a life, and it was the only one that had a death.

The house was the only one that had a love, and it was the only one that had a hate.
