The Bontoc Igorot:

The Bontoc Igorot Albert Ernest Jenks, 2022-07-31 Albert Ernest Jenks's The Bontoc Igorot stands as a seminal anthropological work offering invaluable insight into the lives and culture of the Igorot people of the Philippines. Jenks employs a comprehensive ethnographic approach encapsulating the social structures, religious practices, and daily life of the Bontoc Igorot community. His description is precise, marrying meticulous research with a narrative style that threads the fabric of Igorot society into a vivid tapestry. As a classic of its era, the book documents a cultural snapshot within the broader literary movement to record and understand indigenous societies at the cusp of the 20th century, where preservation and analysis of these cultures became an emergent field of scholarly endeavor. Jenks was not merely an observer but a dedicated anthropologist whose work was deeply informed by his conviction in the importance of cultural preservation and understanding. His extensive field research in the Philippines under American governance allowed him an intimate perspective that is reflected in the book's detailed observations. The drive to authoritatively document the Bontoc people mirrors the period's academic impetus to both celebrate and critically assess the diversity of human civilization as Western expansion brought many such cultures into the limelight. The Bontoc Igorot is highly recommended for scholars and readers interested in ethnography, Philippine history, and the preservation of indigenous narratives. Jenks's scholarly work serves as a crucial reference point for understanding the complexities of cultural dynamics and the methodologies in early anthropological studies. Rich with detail and historical significance, it challenges contemporary readers to appreciate and engage with the meticulous work of those who first sought to bridge cultural divides through the power of observation and the written word.

The Culture of the Bontoc Igorot Carmencita Cawed, 1972 One of the very healthy developments in social science in the Philippines and perhaps in many of the so-called developing countries is the emergence of a very intelligent, hard-working, and pioneering crop of young native social scientists and educationists well-grounded on their own cultural values and traditions. This is indeed a drastic departure from the traditional social science which has been dominated by American and European scholars who have chosen to specialize on the Philippines. However, especially after independence in 1946, a new crop of social scientists enriching the social science heritage from the native point of view emerged. This book is a humble contribution to the national effort to write about Philippine society, especially Bontoc society, from the point of view of a Bontoc social scientist. Miss Cawed has dwelt at length on the history, the culture, and society of this ethnic group. Her descriptions of their social organization, marriage customs, music, belief systems, and other interesting aspects of their culture will inform the specialists as well as the non-specialists about her own society.
