These findings corroborate previous studies that have demonstrated associations between personality and self-esteem. However, these previous studies have focused on personality traits and the self-esteem phenotypic model of personality. Recent studies have shown many dimensions are preexisting to the individual. Accordingly, associations of this nature are not surprising. Self-esteem and other human qualities are more dispositional than situational and the evidence to date seems to suggest no causal relationship between them. However, it is not the self-esteem itself that needs to be considered, but the way in which it is used. The evidence seems to indicate that self-esteem is used to maintain the positive self-image, and the negative self-image. The positive self-image will maintain one's self-esteem. However, the negative self-image will maintain one's self-esteem. This, although relationships and relationships between self-esteem and personality are often described as causal, does not support the notion that self-esteem is the primary factor. The negative self-image is preexisting and preexisting. Consequently, one's self-esteem and one's self-image are interrelated. However, the negative self-image is not the primary factor.
