Herbert Howland Sargent, 2013-09 This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book without typos from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1907 edition. Excerpt: he telegraphed a report of the same to the Secretary of the Navy adding: If ten thousand men were here, city and fleet would be ours within forty-eight hours. Every consideration demands immediate army movement; if delayed, city will be defended more strongly by guns taken from the fleet. But the almost inextricable confusion at Tampa and the receipt of a false report that two Spanish cruisers and a torpedo boat destroyer had been seen in the Nicolas Channel delayed the departure of the Fifth Corps for about two weeks. Finally on June 14 the expedition, convoyed by the Indiana and several smaller ships, set sail for Santiago de Cuba. It is not the intention at this time to describe in detail the sailing and disembarkation of General Shafter's army, that is reserved for another chapter. But it may be remarked here that this army arrived at Santiago on June 20 and in conjunction with the navy was then ready to strike the blows which were to decide the fate of Cuba and end the war. The delay at Tampa was but the lull before the storm. Comments: No sooner had the naval authorities of Spain received positive information of Admiral Dewey's victory in the Philippines than they felt the need of having a strong naval force in home waters. Accordingly the despatch of May 12 authorizing Cervera's return was sent, and so anxious were they that this despatch should reach Cervera before he arrived in any Cuban or Porto Rican port that three days later the commandant at San Juan, Porto Rico, was directed to use every possible means to forward it to the admiral who was then at Curacao. As Admiral Cervera did not receive the despatch until his return to Spain several months later, and as he did not even learn that such a despatch had been sent.
