

Tapirs, Rhinoceroses

RHINOCEROTIDAE

Rhinoceros Family
Of the living perissodactyl mammals, only the rhinoceroses share the massive, bulky bodies and the thick, wrinkled skin that was so common among the saurians, now extinct among the saurians. There are five species of rhinoceroses, found in Africa and Southeast Asia, and all have large heads and small bodies. They are all herbivorous, feeding on grass and leaves. The rhinoceros is a very powerful animal, and its skin is extremely thick, with some species having a single horn and others having two. Males and females both have horns, but females tend to have smaller horns.

Asian Indian Rhinoceros, Rhinoceros unicornis
RANGE: Nepal, N.E. India
HABITAT: grassland to swampy areas
BODY: 4.2 m (13 ft 8 in)
TALL: 1.8 m (5 ft 11 in)

The largest of the Asian species, the Indian rhinoceros has a thick, dark-grey hide marked with many small protuberances. The skin follows deep folds at the joints, giving the rhinoceros an armor-plated appearance. Each year has a single horn on the head, but the female's horn is smaller. Generally a solitary animal, the Indian rhinoceros feeds in the morning and evening on grass, weeds and large and small during the remainder of the day.

The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The young rhinoceros is active even after birth and is suckled for up to 2 years.

Asian Sumatran Rhinoceros, Rhinoceros sumatrensis
RANGE: Borneo, Thailand, Malaya
HABITAT: dense forest, near swamps
BODY: 2.3-2.8 m (7 ft 6 in-9 ft 2 in)
TALL: about 1.5 m (4 ft 11 in)

The smallest member of its family, the Sumatran rhinoceros has two horns, most of the female are smaller than the male's. Both horns are covered in a thick skin and fringe the edges of the nose. Sumatran rhinoceroses are usually solitary, although a male and female pair may live together. They feed mostly in the early morning and evening on ferns, roots, fruit and bamboo shoots and may trample down small trees to browse on their foliage. Like other rhinoceroses, this species has good hearing and sense of smell, but its sight is poor.

The female bears a single young after a gestation of about 1 to 1.5 months.

Asian, Square-tipped White Rhinoceros, Ceratotherium simum
RANGE: Africa, N.W. Uganda
HABITAT: savanna, floodplains
BODY: 4.5 m (14 ft 9 in)
TALL: 1.8 m (5 ft 11 in)

The largest living land animal, the white rhinoceros has a long head, which is covered in a long, wrinkled skin. The skin is covered in a long, wrinkled skin. The rhinoceros is a very powerful animal, and its skin is extremely thick, with some species having a single horn and others having two. Males and females both have horns, but females tend to have smaller horns.

Despite its size, the rhinoceros is a placid animal, feeding on grass and leaves. Each year has a single horn on the head, but the female's horn is smaller. Generally a solitary animal, the rhinoceros feeds in the morning and evening on grass, weeds and large and small during the remainder of the day.

The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The young rhinoceros is active even after birth and is suckled for up to 2 years.

Asian, Black Rhinoceros, Rhinoceros blacki
RANGE: Africa, S. Chad and Sudan
HABITAT: savanna, floodplains
BODY: 3-3.5 m (9 ft 8 in-11 ft 4 in)
TALL: 1.8 m (5 ft 11 in)

The black rhinoceros is, in fact, an index that varies according to the shape of its horns. It has a long neck but has a large head, but its body is relatively small. The rhinoceros is a very powerful animal, and its skin is extremely thick, with some species having a single horn and others having two. Males and females both have horns, but females tend to have smaller horns.

Male and female rhinoceroses usually live alone, except when mating. The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The young rhinoceros is active even after birth and is suckled for up to 2 years.
